

An Analytical Study on The Concept of Equality with Emphasis on Challenges and Frameworks

Sd Sha Taukirul Islam, Department of Political Science, Sardar Patel University, Balaghat
Dr. Priti Kushwaha, Supervisor, Sardar Patel University, Balaghat

Abstract

This analytical work examines the constantly shifting nature of equality by focusing on the conceptual roots, structural realities, and legal and institutional mechanisms designed to uphold equality. The study critically examines the key theoretical frameworks, considerations, in regards to equality, from notions of formal and substantive equality, to Rawls' theory of justice, to Amartya Sen's capability approach, and how each framework moves us closer to understanding fairness and justice in rapid changing contexts. The study examines the multidimensional character of equality in legal, political, social, and his/her/ their own domains, and the ways in which these domains interact and influence one another. By examining pressing issues such as, caste exclusion, gender inequities, economic inequalities, and political underrepresentation, the study reveals that the formal legal guarantees often do not translate into actual empowerment, especially regarding marginalized populations. The important role of intersectionality is examined as a critical manner of approaching overlapping disadvantages faced by those on the margins of the margins. In examining both the nation state and global standards, the study makes an argument for a rights based, inclusive, intersectional, approach to equality, and not simply symbolic assurances toward meaningful participation, justice, and social transformation.

Keywords: Equality, Discrimination, Social Justice, Legal Frameworks, Intersectionality, Economic Inequality, Gender Disparity, Political Marginalization.

1. INTRODUCTION

Equality is a fundamental element of any fair and democratic society. Equality is both an ethical obligation and a legal duty, and it has the central meaning that all persons should have the same legal rights and protections, as well as some opportunities, regardless of caste, class, gender, race, ethnicity, religion, or socio-economic status. The contemporary understanding of equality has emerged from centuries of philosophical thinking and political conflict and is officially articulated in various national constitutions, civil rights movements, and international human rights statements. An example is the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), which established equality as a basic human right and proposed that dignity and justice are not possible without fairness and equality.

Equality is comfortably accepted on paper, equality in practice remains problematic. Around the globe, societies are struggling with outstanding injustices, exploitations from colonialism, inequalities based on gender, and serious gaps in wealth. All these collective consequences remain latently manifested in the form of inequalities and systemic discrimination. In the Indian context, the intensity discussed above is reflected in the layered complexity of caste-animosity, systemic gender-based violence, regional inequalities, and practice of religious marginalization. While Articles 14 to 18 of the Constitution guarantees equality for all, equality in practice is frequently undermined. In this sense, the story of equality in the Indian context is about equal treatment, but addressing and dismantling structural inequalities, empowering socially disadvantaged groups, and ensuring equality results in equitable outcomes.

1.1. Background of the Study

The premise of this study originates from the increasing apprehension that formal legal guarantees do not provide the conditionality required to achieve real equality in society. Even in pluralistic democracies like India, there is a gap between our constitutional principles and the social reality. While affirmative action, welfare schemes, and judicial activism have made some strides, there remains a gulf in almost every aspect of life—education, employment, political representation, and access to justice. The global conversations around intersectionality, substantive equality, and rights-based development are causing both academics and policymakers to rethink old paradigms. The objective of this study is to critically assess the current concept of equality, the challenges to achieving it, and the institutional structures at both a national and international level that seek to protect it. In this way, it will build on existing academic and policy conversations around moving from an attitude of symbolic equality to real inclusion.

1.2. Objective of the Study

- To study the theoretical foundations of equality.
- To analyze types of equality: legal, political, social, and economic.
- To identify key challenges to achieving equality.
- To evaluate existing legal and policy frameworks.
- To suggest inclusive and intersectional solutions for real equality.

2. LITERATURE REVIEW

Borah (2014) conducted a study on the socio-economic status of women entrepreneurs in the Morigaon district of Assam. The study emphasized that entrepreneurship had taken on special significance in India's evolving socio-economic, and political context and the evolving phase of liberalization, privatization, and globalization. Borah had found that entrepreneurship was a catalyst for change in poorer regions, ultimately resulting in an improved standard of living, increased per capita income, and enhanced capital formation. Women entrepreneurs nonetheless contributed significantly to economic development through their ability to take on risks, be innovative, and make decisions despite facing various external constraints.

Das (2012) investigated women's human rights in North-East India and explained how fixed and critical social attitudes, patriarchal and gender-specific norms and practices, sustained inequality between men and women. The study discussed how women are still seen as weaker, inferior and subordinate to men in traditional societies and that even though the World Conference on Human Rights in 1993 recognized women's rights as human rights, there were still gender-based violations in the context of North-East India. The study illustrated the situation that women and girls found themselves in pertaining to cultural and structural barriers to their rights.

Devi (2016) focused her study on women entrepreneurs in Sivakasi Taluk and researched their socio-economic contribution, and issues. The study showed that many women started businesses due to necessity or for economic independence. Devi stated that these women were significant to their families and communities, however, had to deal with issues such as access to credit, lack of training, and social issues. Despite the issues, the study indicated that women entrepreneurs in the area were increasingly developing confidence and gaining recognition while they contributed to the economic development in the local area.

Guravaiah (2016) studied the legal provisions with child rights to education and its extensive connection to human rights. The study highlighted India's commitment as a constitutional and international obligation that all children have the right to free and compulsory education. Guravaiah discussed and highlighted important legal documents like the Right of Children to Free and Compulsory Education Act 2009, while emphasizing that although there were legal provisions in place, implementation remained absent fiercely for rural areas and marginalized families. Guravaiah pointed out that there needed to be stronger measures of accountability, and social awareness to considered educational rights, being that education is a basic human right.

Hazarika (2011) offered a short discussion on women's empowerment in India, discussing socio-economic and political aspects. The research situates empowerment as a multi-dimensional process that enables women to take greater control over their lives, as well as equal access to decision-making. Hazarika's emphasis was on, while significant effort was made by the government to assist women with legal and government opportunities, the effects of cultural norms and gender bias have not changed as significantly. The study suggested a more coordinated endeavor focused on education, economic opportunity, and change to promote sustained empowerment for women nationwide.

3. THEORETICAL FOUNDATIONS OF EQUALITY

The idea of equality has undergone significant change throughout human history, influenced by diverse philosophical traditions and socio-political developments. Equality has changed from a crude conception of equal treatment to a more sophisticated view that recognizes the existence of structural inequities.

Figure 1: Gender Equality

- Formal Equality: This is the classical model of equality, rooted in the work of liberal thinkers such as John Locke, which relies on legal equality, equal treatment regardless social group categories (such as their social, cultural, or economic status). It forms the foundation of liberal democratic notions of rule of law and civil rights. However, critics point out that formal equality can be problematic, since it can also ignore deep systemic and historical disadvantages. If we treat people equally in unequal contexts, we may inadvertently perpetuating injustice.
- Substantive Equality: Along with formal equality, substantive equality accepts that to be fair usually includes being less than equal in treatment to achieve actually equal outcomes. Despite the fact it is built on social justice theories, substantive equality can be at the basis of policy options like affirmative action, reservations, and redistributive welfare strategies. Substantive equality seeks to remove structural barriers like poverty, discrimination and lack of accessibility which stop disadvantaged groups from equally from competing with others.
- John Rawls' Theory of Justice: In his landmark book A Theory of Justice, philosopher John Rawls provided a compelling framework for understanding equality within the context of a concept of fairness. He states there are two principles of social justice he wants us to adopt; 1. there must be equal basic liberties for citizens, and 2. we must accept some social and economic inequalities only to the extent that these inequalities improve conditions for the least advantaged members of society. So he connects fairness to liberty, but also argues for a vision of society where institutions are arranged to maximize justice, and moral legitimacy.
- Amartya Sen's Capability Approach: Amartya Sen, a Nobel Prize-winning economist, challenged traditional economic and utilitarian notions of equality with the capability approach. Sen proposed that true equality is not defined by simple resource access or legally sanctioned rights, but rests on an individual's actual ability to function (that is what one is able to do and be). Thus, the focus of the capability approach is shifted away from formal entitlements to real opportunities and well-being for individuals, particularly in areas such as education, health, gender justice and social development.

Together, these frameworks point out that equality is not a singular concept but instead, a multi-dimensional one where legal rights, socioeconomic circumstances, capabilities, and moral justice are all elements involved in equality. They urge policy makers to create not only equal treatment interventions, but also equitable impact interventions that support an inclusive, participatory, and just society for everyone.

4. TYPES OF EQUALITY

A complete understanding of equality requires considering its many aspects. Equality is not one, it is many - legal equality, political equality, social equality, and economic equality. Each of these different forms of equality is interdependent, and progress in one equality depends on progress in the other types of equality. Thinking of these different types of equality apart from each other means we often make surface or incomplete changes.

Figure 2: Types of Equality

4.1 Legal Equality

Legal equality means that all individuals are treated equally in the eyes of the law, regardless of personal or situational circumstances. It guarantees that all citizens, whether rich or poor, privileged or disadvantaged, fall under the same legal guidelines and have equal access to justice. This idea forms the bedrock of democratic governance and the rule of law. It contains guarantees of due process and equal protection in law, along with guarantees of basic rights of freedom of speech, freedom of expression, etc. Practical limitations to legal equality do exist, including the structural inequality put on marginalized communities through law enforcement, limited knowledge of law, and inequality in representation under the law. Legal aid schemes, judicial reviews, and human rights commissions are some of the means used to promote equality before the law.

4.2 Political Equality

The notion of political equality exists to ensure that all people have an equal say when it comes to participating in decisions made by a state. Political equality entails the right to vote, a right to run for office, and freedom of political expression and equality of participation within democratic processes. Political equality is foundational to representative democracy. Yet, real world practices present a different picture. Political equality can be inhibited by voter suppression tactics, or through manipulation and misinformation. Structural hurdles to entering the political sphere, such as the cost of campaigning and funding elections disproportionately affect women, people from other non-dominant social identities, and people from lower economic backgrounds. When these groups are underrepresented in legislatures and policy settings, it extends their exclusion. Electoral reforms, legislation on campaign finance and election funding, and reservation policies are some of the most effective avenues for realizing true political equality.

4.3 Social Equality

Social equality promotes the removal of hierarchical differences based on caste, gender, religion, ethnicity, and other identity markers, and strives for dignity, respect, and equality of opportunity in social interactions and institutions, such as education, marriage, and employment. Despite constitutional law and affirmative action policies with progressive guarantees in support of social equality, social inequality remains entrenched particularly in more traditional societies such as India, which struggles with entrenched caste-based discrimination, communal polarization, gender-violence, and crimes marked by honor. In this context, gender inequality emphasizes wage gaps, mobility, and workplaces marked by gender's under-representation in leadership positions. Combatting social inequality is an objective that requires long-term engagement with education, awareness, inclusivity of policies, and enforcement of anti-discrimination and related legislation.

4.4 Economic Equality

Economic equality means a fair distribution of wealth, income, and access to economic opportunity. Economic equality focuses on decreasing the differences between the rich and poor by ensuring that every person has the necessary resources to meet a minimal standard of living. In developing countries, economic inequality is also magnified by the presence of unemployment and lack of employment, actual ownership of land, exploitative employment practices, and inequitable regional development. Concentrated wealth leads to concentrated access to quality education, health care, and mobility in society. Governments may use many tools to combat economic inequality, including progressive taxation, social safety nets, skills development programs, and rural employment programs.

5. CHALLENGES IN ENSURING EQUALITY

While there is no lack of theoretical foundations, constitutional mandates, and a positive legal environment, equal opportunity in practice is still hard to find. A multitude of structural, socio economic and political barriers continue to challenge the proper implementation and reinforcement of equality - these barriers impact one another. It is important to understand, so as to design effective policy responses and interventions.

a) Structural Discrimination

Structural discrimination refers to the deeply embedded, institutionalized systems of prejudice or bias that endure across societies. Structural discrimination is not just a hangover from the past but shapes access to rights and resources today. In India, despite the formal outlawing of the caste system, the caste system remains a powerful arbiter of social status and opportunity. Dalits and other marginalized castes encounter continued discrimination in education, work opportunities, housing, and access to water and sanitation. Discrimination that happened 60 years ago or 400 years ago has continuing consequences today, where discrimination can include both dramatics, systemic violence, and subtle systems of exclusion, including social exclusion or curtailed mobilities in the workplace. Other parts of the world have had and still have similar structures, like the institutionalized forms of racial segregation in the United States or apartheid in South Africa. Those systems of discrimination have legacies and need to be understood as contributing to contemporary attitudes and behaviors, as well as economic inequality that have continued for generations. Such entrenched systems cannot be challenged solely through statutory means and require culturally-, educationally-, and institutionally based systems of change taken over time.

b) Economic Inequality

Economic inequality is one of the greatest barriers to true equality. In its latest reports, Oxfam indicated India's richest 1% holds more than 40% of the wealth, while millions in India face poverty and unemployment. While economic inequality poses enormous challenges to human beings' access to basic human needs - quality education, quality health care, quality housing, and quality digital access – it also undermines meritocracy. In other words, wealthier individuals enjoy access to superior resources, and this continually reproduces privilege and economic inequality from generation to generation. The absence of economic mobility results in cyclical poverty that is entrenched for many marginalized groups and breeds societal resentment and social unrest. Welfare schemes and social safety nets are not immune from similar challenges of reach and efficiency, and we cannot forget the barriers of the bureaucracy and corrupt practices associated with them.

c) Gender Disparities

Inequality of gender is systemic and influences every aspect of social life; it does not only adversely affect women and girls, but also transgender and gender non-conforming people. Patriarchal norms and practices find ways to institutionalize prescriptions for roles, behaviors and access to resources. The wage gap persists, women remain underrepresented in leadership positions and political decision-making, and access to property rights for women remains weak. Although legal protections in the forms of acts like Domestic Violence Act and Sexual Harassment of Women at Workplace Act exist, gender-based violence which encompasses domestic abuse, sexual harassment, and honour killing continues to be widespread, as most implementations are undermined or weak, lessened by social stigma, social ignorance and institutional apathy. For transgender persons, legal or social recognition remains a challenge, despite the unfurling of the NALSA judgement in 2014, reaffirming the rights for gender minority groups in India. Many institutional infrastructure disadvantages continue to promote the discrimination of transgender individuals in educational and employment arenas, as well as in access to health resources. All of which negatively contributes to the wider understanding of gender.

d) Political Marginalization

True political equality involves more than just the right to vote; it also includes the right to have meaningful involvement and representation in all structures of governance. However, we know Dalits, Adivasis, and religious minorities often do not have their voices heard in legislative assemblies, bureaucracies and other forms of power unless there is reserved representation for Scheduled Castes and Tribes. This is particularly problematic when these groups are used as a token for vote banks when their issues of land, poverty and displacement, education or justice are not addressed, nor to mention because of socio-economic aspects such as not being literate enough, not having campaign finances or not being safe because they belong to vulnerable backgrounds.

e) Intersectionality

Intersectionality, developed by Kimberlé Crenshaw, implies the circumstances under which different axes of identity, such as caste, gender, class, disability, religion, and sexual orientation, come together to create distinct forms of disadvantage. A Dalit woman may, at the same time, experience discrimination based on caste, gendered oppression, and economic exclusion. In a similar context, a disabled LGBTQ+ person may encounter overlap, compounding prejudices that are rarely addressed with a singular lens. Mainstream policy approaches tend to ignore these overlapping vulnerabilities, which can highlight blindspots in program delivery and planning. Without an intersectional perspective initiative claiming to promote equality are open to benefitting the better-off members of these marginalized groups perpetuating an internal hierarchy.

6. CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the quest for equality remains an important one, though this remains a critical yet challenging issue in modern societies, especially in a diverse and stratified nation like India. It is true that strong constitutional provisions, theoretical constructs, and normative principles help set up a basis for equality; when it comes to the lived experience of disadvantaged groups, however, stumbling blocks like entrenched structural discrimination, economic inequality, gender injustice, political disempowerment, and unaware intersectionality can inhibit the potential effects of these constitutional, theoretical, and normative constructs. Legal equality and formal equality are insufficient unless it is followed-up with substantive historical injustice remedies that strike at the heart of disadvantageous groups. It is then important to speak of inclusive, equitable, and participatory development based upon moral conceptualizations and socio-economic contexts if symbolic equality is to be made equals. Bridging the gap between equality as a normative claim and equality in practice will require the will to legislate, but also to effect cultural change and institutional accountability, and to raise awareness for sustained civic engagement.

REFERENCES

1. Akhtar, H., & Haque, M. E. (2014). The role of son preference on modern contraceptive use in Bangladesh. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 19(7), 89–96.
2. Bhattacharyya, A., & Ghosh, B. N. (2012). Women in Indian Information Technology (IT) sector: A sociological analysis. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 3(6), 45–52.
3. Borah, A. (2014). Socio-economic status of women entrepreneurship – A case study of Morigaon District in Assam. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 19(7), 26–33. <https://doi.org/10.9790/0837-19732633>
4. Das, J. (2012). Women's human rights in North-East India. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 3(4), 34–37.
5. Devi, G. A. (2016). A study on women entrepreneurs in Sivakasi Taluk. International Education and Research Journal, 2(7), 71–73.
6. Guravaiah. (2016). Legal provisions on the child rights to education and human rights. International Journal of Academic Research, 3(3[2]), 66–70.

7. Hazarika, D. (2011). Women empowerment in India: A brief discussion. International Journal of Educational Planning & Administration, 1(3), 199–202.
8. Iqbal, H., Afzal, S., & Inayat, M. (2012). Gender discrimination: Implication for Pakistan security. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 1(4), 16–25.
9. Jayakumar, K. S. (2016). A critical study on women's rights in Indian Constitution. International Journal of Law, Education, Social and Sports Studies (IJLESS), 3(2), 18–23.
10. Mishra, D. (2012). Pleasure: Redefined by women in Shobha De's novel. IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS), 3(4), 15–20.
11. Olatunji, C.-M. P. (2013). An argument for gender equality in Africa. CLCWeb: Comparative Literature and Culture, 15(1), 1–8. <https://doi.org/10.7771/1481-4374.2157>
12. Shrivastava, D., & Chaudhary, P. (2015). Practices and perceptions regarding menstruation amongst rural adolescent girls of Sawangi. International Education and Research Journal, 1(5), 51–54. The Free Encyclopedia
13. Singh, A. (2011). Female foeticide in India: A shocking reality. The Banaras Law Journal, 40(1–2), 223–236.
14. Srinavasa, D., & Siddegowda, Y. S. (2015). Recent trends in women empowerment: An analysis. International Education and Research Journal, 1(5), 100–103.
15. Waris, A., & Vikratamath, B. C. (2013). Gender gaps and women's empowerment in India – Issues and strategies. International Journal of Scientific and Research Publications, 3(9), 1–9.

ADVANCED SCIENCE INDEX

